Fabio's Cape, named after the Temerian explorer Fabio Sachs, is a headland in the Nordling colony of Ryvle, within the Confederation of Fabiola on the Western Continent. It is remembered as the place where Sachs is believed to have drawn his last breath, after all the members of his exploratory vessel, including him succumbed to an unknown disease, with him being the last in doing so. This doomed ship was one of the two legendary white ships credited with the discovery of the Silk Islands and, ultimately, the Western Continent itself.

The cape also acquired the local epithet Magnet Cape due to the treacherous currents that drag passing vessels toward its jagged coast, and Owl´s Cape due to enormous present of different species of tropical owls.

In the 1380s, decades after Sachs's final voyage, Fabio's Cape became infamous once more when restless specters began infecting with a mysterious disease and terrorizing the newly founded settlements in the area.

The haunting ended when Putnam Pitch—former witcher of the Griffin School, later grandmaster and founder of the School of the Crane, and Sachs's closest friend and companion on all his expeditions—finally set foot on the cape. Having returned on the second ship of Sachs's final journey decades earlier, Putnam by then had become a colonist of the New World himself. The School of the Crane was already established at Kaer Darh on Hawaiki, in the Silk Islands, and Putnam and his wife and co-founder Jolanta Dinmarb were traveling through the colonies to recruit the first generation of Crane Witchers when they were contracted by the colonial governor of Ryvle to investigate the disturbances.

There they uncovered an infestation of wraiths. More specifically of Plague Lords, the male counterparts of Plague Maidens, alongside a single Red Miasmal, born from the collective torment of Sachs's doomed crew. These spirits had lingered for nearly eighty years but were stirred into violent activity by the arrival of settlers.

The hunt proved perilous. At its climax, the Red Miasmal possessed Sachs's own remains, forcing Putnam to confront both his past and the memory of his fallen friend. Together, Putnam and Jolanta destroyed the specters, laid Sachs and his men to rest with proper burials, and at last cleansed the cape.
